Trailblazing trans artist Shawna Virago's single, "Heaven Sent Delinquent" has released a simple, acoustic number that is a sharp but witty criticism towards organized religion. As a longtime feminist punk rocker, Virago critiques religion while infusing catchy, friendly sounding riffs and Bowie-ish sounding vocals.

Having been an outspoken artist and one of the first trans artists to be "out" since the early 90's, Virago's "Heaven Sent Delinquent" won't grab you at first. But a few listens in and you will be drawn into her lyrics which are essentially saying people of faith just need to be more understanding. She says it without being loud or even sounding judgmental (even though she kinda is) so not to turn off those she's trying to reach.

Music is open for interpretation and for those "Heaven Sent Delinquent" is written for, it's about hope. But in these pandemic times, we can all listen to "Heaven Sent Delinquent" and pray for hope. And include two beers during your prayer session.
